Message from the President

WOW, I hope all of you are surviving the weird storms we have been having all over the country. Areas that are normally warm are having colder than usual weather. It is pretty bad when it is warmer in Ohio than it is in Florida. Snow in Florida!!! Really?

I am really getting excited about the DCA National in Columbus, Ohio (May 1 - 5). If you haven't heard already, I am judging one of the host club shows so you won't be seeing me competing. But, I will be at ring side watching the best that our breed has to offer, which means there should be a lot of miniatures out there, RIGHT? Remember, this is our Parent club and deserves our support. I would also like to remind you that miniatures can be entered in any class. The only class they can be weighed in is the open miniature class. Let's get those beautiful dogs (and bitches) out there. Another reminder is that you do not have to be a member of DCA to show your dogs. It is a great week of fun, learning, observing, sharing, seeing old friends, and making new ones. Dachshunds are everywhere, "THEY'RE EVERYWHERE" and we love it.

What's happening with NMDC?

This is an election year and Dave Temple, our nomination committee chairperson, with help from his committee, are busy putting together a slate of nominees. You will hear more about this in the coming months.

I want to thank Patty Romigh for her excellent work and numerous hours spent as membership chairperson. Patty turns the reigns over to Janice Finney effective February 2018. Thank you Janice for taking on this challenge.

NMDC 2018, Pat Hodges has everything well under control. Thanks to the Tennessee Valley KC the National will be in Knoxville, TN on Nov 2nd in conjunction with TVKC's all breed shows on Nov 3 & 4. Plan to attend all these shows and build those majors. More information will be forthcoming as things develop. I spoke to Pat and she is looking for committee chairpersons to help. Remember, we can always use volunteers. You can contact Pat at 865-458-0597 or phmontvue@gmail.com if you are willing to lend a hand. In 2013 our National was in this same location and we had 91 entries. I want to challenge you to top this number for 2018.

Thanks to all of you for just being you, and loving our dachshunds.

Be good to one another and share those thoughts.

SHOULD WE BREED WITH CARRIERS?

By Cathryn Mellersh,
Animal Health Trust, November 2011

What Is a Carrier?

'Carrier' is the term given to an individual (of any species) that carries a single copy of a recessive mutation that is associated with a specific inherited condition, usually an inherited disorder. An individual will only suffer from a recessive disorder if it inherits two copies of the causal mutation, one from each parent. If it inherits a single copy of the mutation it will remain healthy but will pass the mutation on to about half of its offspring.

Breeding with Carriers

Once a specific disease mutation has been identified a DNA test can be developed that enables the identification of non-symptomatic carriers. Knowing which dogs carry the mutation and which don't (the so-called 'clear' dogs) enables breeders to make sensible choices about the dogs they mate together. All dogs can be safely bred with provided at least one of the mating pair is clear of the mutation (see Table below). Breeding dogs that will never develop the condition should obviously be the priority for all conscientious breeders and the desire to eliminate a disease-associated mutation from a breed should therefore be the long-term goal. But the instinct to choose only clear dogs to breed from, as soon as a DNA test becomes available, may not always be a sensible choice and the rest of this document discusses why.

If carriers are prevented from the breeding the opportunity to pass the rest of their genetic material to the next generation is also lost and the genetic diversity of the remaining population is thus reduced. It is worth remembering that there is clear and well-established link between the genetic diversity of a population and its overall health, and that breeding closely related individuals tends to lead to the accumulation of deleterious recessive mutations in the population. This is due to the fact that an individual is more likely to inherit two identical copies of a mutation if its parents share common ancestors than if they are unrelated, and the more common ancestors the parents share the greater that chance is.

It is also worth remembering that the disease mutation for which there is a DNA test is not the only mutation a carrier has. Every human, on average, carries about 50 recessive mutations and there is no reason to believe the average dog won't carry a similar number. So the only real difference between a clear and a carrier is the single mutation that can be tested for. Both dogs will both carry around 49 other mutations that the breeder doesn't know about and can't test for. If carriers are not bred from and clear dogs are used extensively then there is a real risk that other mutations will increase in frequency in the breed and new inherited disease(s) could emerge.

There is no reason why the eventual elimination of a disease mutation from a breed shouldn't be the goal, once a DNA test for that mutation becomes available. But, providing all breeding dogs are tested for the mutation prior to mating, the breeders can take their time and ensure that desirable traits are not eliminated along with the disease mutation and that the genetic diversity of the breed is not reduced.

Mutation Frequency

The speed with which the mutation can be eliminated depends on several factors, including the frequency of the mutation, the population structure and the rate of inbreeding for that breed. The more frequent the mutation is the more slowly it should be eliminated. Calculating the true frequency of a mutation is not trivial, and requires a random subset of a breed be screened. Dogs that are tested once a commercial DNA test becomes available are not always representative of the breed as a whole, and similarly cohorts of dogs that have been sampled by a research institute during development of the DNA test are also rarely characteristic of the breed.

The frequency of a mutation is typically expressed as the fraction of chromosomes in a population that carry the mutation. For example, if the frequency of a mutation is described as 0.1, this means that 10% of the chromosomes in that breed carry the mutation and the remaining

90% carry the normal copy of DNA. If 10% of the chromosomes carry the mutation then just under 20% of dogs are expected to be carriers and about 1% of dogs will be affected.

Breeding Advice

Carriers should always be included in the first one to two generations that follow the launch of a DNA test for a recessive mutation, regardless of the frequency of the mutation, to give breeders the opportunity to capture desirable traits, such as breed type and temperament, before they start to select for dogs that are clear of the mutation. Specific breeding policy for future generations should be breed-dependent and ideally formulated after consideration of factors such as the population structure and rate of inbreeding. But in general terms, carriers should only be removed from the breeding population if the frequency of the mutation is below 0.01 (1%), as this will mean only around 2% of dogs will be prevented from breeding. Avoiding carriers of a mutation that is more frequent will result in a greater number of dogs being prevented from breeding and could lead to a detrimental loss of diversity for the breed.

The Well Angulated Front on a Short Breed

Short legs on a dog are useful for digging, getting the mouth and nose close to the ground, and crawling through tunnels. Short legs, however, can decrease speed and jumping. The best way to have a long stride in a short legged breed like the Dachshund is to have what “dog people” refer to as a “well angulated” front – and having one isn’t just for show dogs.

Much of a dog’s physical ability is a function of how its front end is built. Where the scapula and humerus meet, and where the humerus and the radius/ulna join is an angle, and it’s these angles that provide levers. On the levers are muscles that exert the forces that drive the dog’s body forward, important because bones involved in the dog’s front assembly aren’t articulated with the rest of the body by joints. They’re kept in place by ligaments and muscles.

Dogs with well-angulated front limbs can unfold those angles to reach far forward and push well back. This is important because a dog with “good angulation” in the front can cover more ground with less effort with each stride, and that’s important to any dog whether it’s a backyard warrior or a show dog.

A dog with poor angulation has to use more energy to cover the same distance as the well built dog. Put another way, a poorly built dog poops out faster and is at higher risk for injury.

The well angulated Dachshund can sit on it’s “keel” (chest) as it digs furiously and all we see is a blur – and s/he can do it for a long time.
